Last week I attended the Annual Meeting of the National Association of County Agricultural Agents in Tucson, Arizona. Over the years I've attended a number of these meetings and always I have found them useful in increasing my understanding of national and international problems and opportunities we face in agriculture.

There were a number of outstanding speakers - Senator Barry Goldwater; Congressman Morris Udall; Dr. Owen Hallberg, President American Institute of Cooperation; W.R. Bran, Executive Director, Community Service, Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company; and Edwin L. Kirby, Administrator, Extension Service USDA.

Over the years I've discovered that some of my most helpful contacts have been with other Extension Agents from across the country. Even though we are all engaged in that important task of food production; the way we go about it differs significantly.

Let me illustrate - there was an agent from a Wisconsin County that had 1700 dairys in his county - or the county in Texas that's divided into 12 ranches and every rancher has at least one graduate degree or the range country in Pima County Arizona where Tucson is located that will only carry 6 animals per section. A section is 640 acres. Then there's a county in central Arizona with one dairy herd with 1700 cows in the milking string.

From these and many other contacts we have the opportunity of person to person exchange of ideas, programs and methods that are extremely helpful.

Percy Thompson probably grows some of the best tobacco on the poorest soil in Appomattox County. He has started stripping his tobacco and he tells me that this year he don't have to stand back from anybody including Riley Meginson and Carter Martin.

Competition is important in all segments of business, but I know of no group of businessmen who enjoy this competition more than farmers.
